Cancer is a disease of our highly developed civilization and, like death itself, it loves a shining mark. It seldom strikes the vicious, the uncleanly poor, but at those lives that promise most to themselves and their community. It is not common in prisons and asylums. Married women are more frequently affected than the unmarried, fertile women than barren. This prevalence of cancer among the most highly civilized peoples may be accounted for by the fact that by prolonging life more people reach the cancerous age, for it is a disease of middle and past middle life. These considerations bring us face to face with what...
